

True Education.

By LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

ALL who have studied the social problems of great cities, and above all, those who have made it their life work to combat the gigantic evil of intemperance, must be aware that there are innumerable reasons that lead to the prevalence of this vice, and that if we desire to destroy the cause of drunkenness, and to lessen the flood of evil we must make a hundred channels. In order to divert the strength of this mighty tide, and I propose briefly to give my views, after many years' experience, of what in my opinion those channels ought to be, and how they would affect the main question of intemperance.

Of course, in dealing with this question I am looking at it from the point of view of my own country, for clearly as I love America, and often as I have had the privilege of visiting that great country, it is impossible for me to be conversant with the ways of any other nation to be able to speak with authority as to whether the methods that should be adopted in one country are equally necessary for another.

First of all, in England, I think we need a great nation to be a great nation. Unless our nation can be dispersed from the congested districts of our cities, or our cities can be rendered more habitable, with open spaces, trees and gardens, it is impossible to keep a normal and healthy life in our midst.

Drunkenness, a symptom of a deep evil in national life.

It shows us, as unfailingly as a clinical thermometer shows the health of an individual, that our life is unhealthy, and that the existence of our people is monstrous and dreary.

Education of course is the great hope toward which we have to look—education of not one class only, but all classes, from the governing body to the dweller in the slum.

I remember one of the greatest educational authorities in this country being asked what the opinion was of the manner in which we were carrying out our national education, and his answer was to this effect:

If we could suppose for a moment that a fiend was charged with the task of constructing a system of national education for the purpose of keeping the life of its people at the lowest possible level, but which would have its perversity so far limited that it might be capable of being defended by arguments likely to be accepted by a body of men ignorant, probably, of all the principles of education, for the purpose of appointing those men if possible, even more ignorant, the first reflection of that fiend would probably be that every human being has a body with appetites and needs so strong that if the owner of it be not taught how he might control it by rightly guiding it, and if he be allowed to have the habit of doing so, he will most certainly form bad habits, and therefore ruin the body and heart and the mind together.

The fiend therefore would carefully set about abstaining from allowing children to be taught at school pleasant games, full of healthful recreation.

He would urge that schools be built without playgrounds and gymnasiums, and therefore he would know that the moment the children left school they would seek their recreation in saloons, music halls, in the streets, in gambling, and in every other evil way, and if he wished to save the consciences of those who were carrying out such an educational plan he would probably urge that exercises and drills be allowed which could not possibly be carried on by the children after they left school.

And then I think his next object would be to eliminate from the minds of the children everything that could make them see in Nature anything attractive or beautiful.

Indeed he would hide Nature entirely from their eyes, because he would know that persons who succeeded in keeping their hearts and minds healthily active by love of or strong interest in wholesome things all belong to two great classes: First, those who study or delight in the contemplation of Nature, and second, those who delight and study and participate in best work and actions and thoughts and feelings of man.

And that is why a fiend would exclude as far as possible from his schools any first-hand knowledge of Nature. Moreover the great object in the schools would be to make children forget that they have their schools, get away from the influence of their teachers, and above all keep them absolutely ignorant of flowers and birds and woods and fields, and all that is ennobling and inspiring in the works of God and man.

He would allow the curriculum of their education to be a mere jumble of facts learnt from books of which they would understand little, and a string of ideas which their minds have never grasped.

THE WOMAN'S CLUB.

A Most Delightful Talk Given by Mr. James Young.

Mr. James Young gave a delightful talk, which everybody was charmed to hear, at the Woman's Club last afternoon.

Club members who had the pleasure of acquaintance welcomed him again, and Mr. Young, who was introduced most pleasantly by Mrs. J. A. Lefroy, prefaced his "Defense of Shynock" by reference to the reminiscence of enjoyment he derived from being in Richmond once more.

After the talk was over and every one was sorry that the end had to come so soon, an informal reception was held and about a dozen women were seated. Mrs. Southall and Mrs. Conquest presiding at the respective tables. A number of the club members exchanged greetings with Mr. Young. A number of others were introduced and a delightful hour was spent.

Belle Deane, a young man about twenty-three years, who had come over from Petersburg yesterday afternoon to spend the night, arrived at his room at about 1:30 this morning in a house on Locust Alley.

Dr. Seale, who came in charge of the ambulance, found that the young man was not dead. He took the wounded man to the City Hospital.
